BEN NICHOLSON (1894-1982)

Born in Denham, Buckinghamshire in 1894, Ben was the oldest son of the renowned artist Sir William Nicholson and Mabel Pryde, also a painter and sister of the artist James Pryde. Nicholson studied at the Slade School of Art, London between 1910-11 before travelling extensively through Europe and America from 1912 till 1918. During the latter part of these travels he began to concentrate on still-life painting and acknowledged the inspiration of his father.

'I owe a lot to my father-especially to his poetic idea and his still life theme. That didn't come from Cubism, but from my father'. From 1920 to 1931 he was married to the artist Winifred Nicholson, they lived in London and Cumberland, wintered in Castagnola, Switzerland and frequently visited Paris during their travels between England and Switzerland.

In 1921 Nicholson first saw a Cubist work by Picasso, which impressed him immensely, he stated, 'it was what seemed to me then completely abstract and in the centre there was an absolutely miraculous green-very deep, very potent and absolutely real'. He had his first solo show in 1922 at the Adelphi Gallery, London and soon afterwards began to create abstract works, influenced by Synthetic Cubism, which explored objects from different perspectives. This theme remained present throughout his career but he investigated it through different guises, such as within his graphic work, oil wash paintings and wooden reliefs he created of circles, squares and rectangles.

From 1926 Nicholson was chairman of the 7 & 5 society, an artistic group which saw itself as a forum for new ideas, members included Ivan Hitchens, Winifred Nicholson and Christopher Wood. Nicholson met Wood in 1926 and they exhibited together at Beaux Arts Gallery, London, in 1927, the year Nicholson began to adopt a primitive style of painting inspired by Henri Rousseau and early English folk art. During a trip to Cornwall in 1928 with Wood, they met Alfred Wallis whose forthright and naïve style encouraged Nicholson further in his aim to return to the basic fundamentals of drawing and painting.

From 1931 Nicholson lived in London, where he met Barbara Hepworth and Henry Moore. In 1932 he and Hepworth, who became his second wife in 1934, visited Picasso, Braque, Brancusi and Arp in Paris, further trips in 1933 and 1934 saw them meet Mondrian, Moholy-Nagy, Jean Helion and Auguste Herbin. The latter two encouraged Nicholson to join Abstraction-Creation, a group dedicated to promoting abstract art within differing styles. Nicholson's suitability for this group is shown by his 1930s work, with the multiple perspectives and flat picture plane of the 1932 painting, Au Chat Botte, which highlights his contact with Braque and his carved angular White Reliefs of 1933-8, which display...
